chapter nine

Ellen Alhim

Funding, and Educational Standards

Differences in Ideology

LIS Research: Ideology, Finding, and Educational Standards

115
Despite the Federal defer and the widespread impression that the Reagan administration's education initiatives were focused on reducing government spending, the proposed budget reductions for libraries and information services were significant. The proposed cuts included a 10% reduction in funding for the National Library of Medicine and a 15% reduction in funding for the National Endowment for the Humanities. These cuts were part of a broader trend of reduced federal spending on education and information services, which had been a consistent theme throughout the Reagan administration.

Library researchers, however, are concerned that these cuts may have a significant impact on the future of libraries and information services. They argue that libraries are essential for the dissemination of knowledge and for the support of research and education. The cuts, they say, will reduce access to information and will have a negative impact on the ability of libraries to serve their communities.

The agencies funding research are also concerned about the cuts. They argue that libraries are essential for the dissemination of knowledge and for the support of research and education. The cuts, they say, will reduce access to information and will have a negative impact on the ability of libraries to serve their communities.

The loss of funding for libraries and information services is a serious concern. Libraries are essential for the dissemination of knowledge and for the support of research and education. The cuts, they say, will reduce access to information and will have a negative impact on the ability of libraries to serve their communities.

The cuts are also a concern for educators and researchers. They argue that libraries are essential for the dissemination of knowledge and for the support of research and education. The cuts, they say, will reduce access to information and will have a negative impact on the ability of libraries to serve their communities.

The cuts are also a concern for educators and researchers. They argue that libraries are essential for the dissemination of knowledge and for the support of research and education. The cuts, they say, will reduce access to information and will have a negative impact on the ability of libraries to serve their communities.

The cuts are also a concern for educators and researchers. They argue that libraries are essential for the dissemination of knowledge and for the support of research and education. The cuts, they say, will reduce access to information and will have a negative impact on the ability of libraries to serve their communities.

The cuts are also a concern for educators and researchers. They argue that libraries are essential for the dissemination of knowledge and for the support of research and education. The cuts, they say, will reduce access to information and will have a negative impact on the ability of libraries to serve their communities.